I went to Chengdu, China with AIESEC to volunteer in community centres and schools to teach English. I've been learning Mandarin while at university so volunteering in China made most sense to me. It was an amazing learning experience to stay with 3 different host families (who were lovely) and experience the disparities in education that exist even within the one city I visited. The experience reaffirmed how much I want to become a teacher in the future. During my 4 weeks there I prepared English lessons and lessons on environmental issues and delivered them within a team of volunteers from around the world. As well as this the volunteers, including myself, delivered sessions on their own country/culture to enable the children to learn more about other places in the world.
